"People who can write good plays are obviously more numerous than people who can write plays about life. . . . Nothing is rarer than the author who has not only drawn his inspiration from life, but who has also the creative invention and the sense of stage expression necessary to full-blown drama. Heijermans belonged to that select company. . . . 'The Good Hope' burns with the white flame of life. . . . Though written in 1900, we still admire it thirty-four years later, because it communicates the beauties of character—of mariners old and young, of apprehensive women left at home, of fears and catastrophes, or coarse humors and jollifications. Under the spell of this tragedy, with its deep tonal values of a Dutch painting, we begin to understand something of life."

—J. BROOKS ATKINSON.
